

I am a student who is relativley aware of the political happenenings of my country. I was suprised that I had not heard of the planned overview of the FCC consolidation rules, and was dissapointed when I saw that consolidation rules had in fact passed, on PBS' "NOW". It seems like the general public is not keen on this subject, and Chairman Powell has not done anything to ease my discomforting feeling that he is actually trying to hide something by avoiding public debates and discussions. I am against the consolidation of major media companies, and can't help but feel like I have been duped. Just the fact that this was not reported on major television networks is a cause for concern, raising questions on who is pulling the strings of our most famous "journalists". Thanks for reading this, and hopefully someone will call for a review of the FCC's new rules.

Ares Geovanos